The armchair and the side chair in catalogue entry 9, both of which are from the Shuang Shuang Garden, display a distinctive local character. Both have curved, thick seats, side rails with vigorous curves and deeply pointed corners. They are made from lacquered elm, have spindle backs, the seat rail and display a subtle energy.

The side slope of the seat rail and its deeply pointed ends make this chair different from the elm seat "southern official's hat" armchair, which has a removable covering seat rail and rounded ends. There is an absence of curved lines where the seat rail meets the rear stile, but to actually the rail bends down much to give joint with the stile. The strong backrest does of the stile balances the curves of the stile, round-shoulder style. The living curves of the curved spindle between the seat rail and rear stile are continued by the stile, which end in points following down to the ends of the seat rail. Like the rail, the stile turned down to give joint with the curved, rounded front piece, the corners are visible on the upper surface of the stile. There are curved-curved grooved side pieces and simple shaped spindles between the stile and the front piece.

The board seat is supported by a curved base with tapered corners. The three legs expose from the seat frame, and the long members of the seat frame expose from the side section. The seat arched frame has wide-trimmed edges, high flanges, and a simple pointed central ring with a three round. There are simple armrests, each side has a three piece rounded spine, and there is a one piece rounded spine between the front section. The bottom section rail is round and protected by having a removable piece of wood on top of it covered by a strip of bamboo. The bamboo protection is missing on one chair.
