The transition from the diesel-electric "fleet type" submarine to the production "nuclear fast attack" not only changed the size of submarines but produced a fundamental change in their shape. The fleet type design (1) had to compromise a good submerged performance hull form with the need to be seaworthy on the surface where it spent most of its time. The Tang Class diesel-electric fast attack design (2) smoothed much of the hull form to decrease drag. From the Nautilus design (3) was learned a great deal about high-speed submerged ship characteristics. It still retained a small superstructure for surfaced operations.
