Reduction of Human Factors-related Accidents During the Flight Test of Homebuilt Aircraft Through the Application of Professional Flight Test Practices, 2007 Homebuilt aircraft have a high accident rate during the flight test period particularly during their first and second flights For the 2002 2004 period over 1 0% of homebuilt aircraft were involved in an accident on their first flight and 3 3% were involved in accidents in the first 40 hours of operation Untrained low time in aircraft type amateur flight test participants unorthodox flight test procedures and lack of clear guidance as to who should and how to conduct safe and effective flight test lead to unsafe conditions and the accident statistics support this hypothesis In the accidents analyzed lack of experience was specifically cited by the NTSB as a causal factor in 15 6% of the accidents Poor decision making was also a common thread with 15 6% involving faulty decision making by the pilot builder Shappell and Wiegmann's Human Factors Analysis and Classification System HFACS is applied to interpret the statistics and the model is applied to the current state of homebuilt flight test in comparison to professional flight test Detailed comparison is made between amateur and professional flight test practices and case studies are provided to support the analysis The author proposes that ideally flight test is left to trained professionals The training experience and support structure of professional testers and their organizations can effectively mitigate the lack of time in type and training characteristic of the typical homebuilt flight tester Accepting that this is not always practical in the homebuilt flight test world it is recommended that professional practices be applied to amateur flight testing Furthermore it is suggested that the guidance available to amateur flight testers be improved and that regulations require that the homebuilder meet with an FAA designated engineering representative regarding the conduct of flight test FAA General Aviation News ,1974 Library of Congress Subject Headings Library of Congress,1997 Library of Congress Subject Headings Library of Congress.
