

Running Away

It seemed to Ezra that nobody at home paid much attention to him unless he drew something. And then, he would please him, and sometimes would send him.

"Why don't you go out and play ball like other boys he'd believe.

Most times Ezra felt invisible — the invisible boy bought in the candy store — the kind who had secret messages. You had to breathe on it to see it.

In school one day Ezra read a story about a boy who ran away from home. It seemed like a good idea. Besides, nobody would care. They probably wouldn't notice he was gone. He saw himself, like he was a story, striding down the road with a pole balanced on his shoulder. Tied to the pole — a bundle containing his possessions.

Ezra began to plan his trip. What would he take? His favorite marionettes, of course. Every time Benjamin let a marionette, or Gussie for the good ones, Ezra remembered the excitement of them. He played them together and made big scenes, fights, and tracks for his imaginary towns.

He'd also take a sack of seeds. If he met somebody along the way, they could play a game or race, and when he was alone, he could make up stories about the King of Spades and the King of Hearts. And, of course, he would take his games.

What would he do for a pole and cloth to tie his things to? He'd borrow one of Gussie's kitchen towels and the old rag she didn't use anymore. The rag bundle would do just fine.

Ezra planned his trip for days. Finally, he was ready. He wrapped his things in the kitchen towel, tied the towel to the rag, and had it under his foot. He would leave the next morning.

But he would leave wrong goodbye to Gussie. What would she say? Would she say good-bye, or not to go? Would she say, "Don't go too far, you can't leave your friends, don't run away?" Would he change his mind if she did?

The next morning, Gussie was up but Ezra was still the boy who ran away. He whispered to her, "Mama," he said, "I'm running away."

Gussie looked down very carefully. "That bundle is going to fall apart. Here, let me tie it tighter." She tightened the knot and then went right back to her washing. Did she think he was kidding? She didn't want to know that he was serious.
