

These findings are also consistent with the idea that people's beliefs about the world are shaped by their experiences. For example, people who live in areas with high levels of pollution are more likely to believe that the world is a dangerous place. This is because they have more direct experience with pollution and its effects. In contrast, people who live in areas with low levels of pollution are more likely to believe that the world is a safe place. This is because they have less direct experience with pollution and its effects. These findings suggest that people's beliefs about the world are shaped by their experiences, and that these beliefs can have a significant impact on their behavior.
