

Running Away

It seemed to Ezra that nobody at home paid much attention to him unless he drew something. And then, he would please him, and sometimes would send him.

"Why don't you go out and play ball like other boys he'd believe.

Most times Ezra felt invisible — the invisible boy bought in the candy store — the kind who had no secret messages. You had to breathe on it to see it.

In school one day Ezra read a story about a boy who ran away from home. It seemed like a good idea. Besides, nobody would care. They probably wouldn't notice he was gone. He saw himself, like he was in a story, striding down the road with a pole balanced on his shoulder. Tied to the pole — a bundle containing his possessions.

Ezra began to plan his trip. What would he take? His favorite marbles, of course. Every time Benjamin let a marble, or Cassie let the dog alone, Ezra continued the unmatchable marbles. He played them together and made big cubes, hats, and tracks for his imaginary team.

He'd also take a sack of seeds. If he met somebody along the way, they could play a game or two, and when he was alone, he could make up stories about the King of Spades and the Knight. And, of course, he would take his games.

What would he do for a pole and cloth to tie his things to? He'd borrow one of Cassie's kitchen towels and the old rug she didn't use anymore. The rug bundle would be just fine.

Ezra planned his trip for days. Finally, he was ready. He wrapped his things in the kitchen towel, tied the towel to the rug, and had it under his foot. He would leave the next morning.

But he would leave wrong goodbye to Cassie. What would she say? Would she say good-bye to him to go? Would she say, "Don't be late, you can't leave your friends. Please don't run away." Would he change his mind if she did?

The next morning, Cassie was on her knees scrubbing the floor when Ezra approached her. "Mama," he said, "I'm running away."

Cassie looked down very carefully. "That bundle is going to fall apart. Here, let me tie it tighter." She tightened the knot and then went right back to her scrubbing. Did she think he was kidding? She didn't want to know that he was serious.
