Rubio-Ramirez, 2012-01-01 Real exchange rates exhibit important low frequency fluctuations This makes the analysis of real exchange rates at all frequencies a more sound exercise than the typical business cycle one which compares actual and simulated data after the Hodrick Prescott filter is applied to both A simple two country two good model as described in Heathcote and Perri 2002 can explain the volatility of the real exchange rate when all frequencies are studied The puzzle is that the model generates too much persistence of the real exchange rate instead of too little as the business cycle analysis asserts Finally we show that the introduction of adjustment costs in production and in portfolio holdings allows us to reconcile theory and this feature of the data

Gains from Trade Liberalization between Heterogeneous Countries Gihoon Hong and Soo Hyun Oh,Korea Institute for International Economic Policy (South Korea),2013-12-31 We study the welfare implications of a bilateral free trade agreement The model is based on the recent trade literature that considers search and matching frictions in the labor market We extend the model by incorporating country level heterogeneity in terms of production technology population and productivity endowment Model simulation results show a simultaneous tariff cut between symmetric countries to reduce unemployment rates and increase prices in the product market due to higher long run demand while nevertheless benefiting the economy owing to a more rapid rise in consumer income In the case of asymmetric countries we find that larger gains from greater openness to trade accrue to a country with relatively more elastic supply occasioned by capital intensive production technology that accommodates more flexible adjustments to output in response to increased demand We calibrate the model to Korean and Japanese data in order to assess the expected outcome of the potential trade liberalization between those countries With a scenario of symmetric level of trade liberalization in terms of trade cost reduction when we assume the same population size in a counterfactual way we find Japan to receive greater benefits from the opening because its relatively more capital intensive production allow for quicker output adjustment upon trade liberalization When we presume however that Japan's population is 2.5 times that of Korea the results show Korea to enjoy a slightly more surplus due to the market size
