Gothic Art From The Twelfth To Fifteenth Centuries:

Gothic Art from the Twelfth to Fifteenth Centuries Andrew Martindale, 1967 Few artistic terms have had such a confused history as the word Gothic Andrew Martindale approaches this complex period by first setting up terms with which to deal with it He considers Gothic art basically as the style that developed in the Ile de France and northern France from 1140 to 1240 He traces the ascendancy of the style in other areas of France and in adjoining countries until 1250 when Paris had become an important artistic center and the northern French style had been widely adopted outside France then Martindale treats Italian art of the next century which culminated in the painting of Giotto He shows how the Gothic style influenced the Italians and how their style in turn began to spread northward From 1350 to 1400 there was increased exchange of artistic ideas across the Alps There is a chapter on the brief flowering of Prague as the center of a curiously hybrid culture at this time Gothic Art is equally comprehensive in its treatment of the minor arts of the age and their interrelations painting manuscript illumination stained glass tapestry and metalwork From publisher's description
