The armchair and the side chair in catalogue entry 9, both of which are from the Shuang Shuang Garden, display a distinctive local character. Both have curved, thick, cane side rails with vigorous curves and deeply pointed corners. They are made from lacquered elm, have spindle backs, the cane rail, and display a subtle elegance.

The side slope of the cane rail and its deeply pointed ends make this chair different from the elm seat "Southern Official's Hat" armchair, which has a removable covering cane rail and rounded ends. There is an absence of curved lines where the cane rail meets the rear stile, but to actually the rail bends down much to give joint with the stile. The strong backrest and the cane rail balance the curves of the thick, round-shouldered sides. The living curves of the cane rail gradually between the cane rail and rear stile are continued by the arms, which end in points following down to the ends of the cane rail. Like the rail, the arms extend down to give joint with the cane rail, rounded front points, the cane rail is visible on the upper surface of the cane. There are curved-curved, gracefully side points and simple shaped spindles between the cane and the cane points.

The board seat is supported by a curved base with tapered corners. The three legs extend from the seat frame, and the long members of the seat frame support the cane rail and the cane backrest. The cane arched frame has wide-brimmed sides, high flanges, and a simple pointed central top with a three-point. There are simple armrests, each side has a three-point, rounded spine, and there is a cane piece stretched across between the frame structure. The bamboo cane rail itself is round and protected by having a removable piece of wood on top of it covered by a strip of bamboo. The bamboo protection is missing on one side.
