

whose builders happen to be largely on the Christian theological side, people such as Ian Barbour, Arthur Peacocke, or Ted Peters who is a co-editor of, and contributor to, this book. We decided that while issues arising from and within cosmology and biology would be our specific focus, the very question of methodology and the fundamental task of defining the very terms of discourse, these would themselves be a central concern for reflection, investigation, and articulation – and this burden, let us note, is the burden of the pioneer.

Mustansir Mir takes up this question directly in his chapter. Evidently, Mustansir Mir is seeking to set the very terms of the Islamic discourse on religion and science, and this is precisely what Ted Peters undertook for a theistic discourse in his chapter, "Science and Faith: From Warfare to Consonance", cited by the former. Both of these chapters prepare new ground for a new synthesis, and both appear in the first and the largest part of this volume dealing with philosophical, historical, and methodological issues.

Muzaffar Iqbal's chapter, with which the first section appropriately begins, also speaks in the tone of a discoverer. On a wide canvass, the chapter carries out an extensive historical excursus into the whole question of the relationship between the Islamic scientific tradition and the post-Renaissance science of Latin Christendom. In the opinion of this co-editor of this volume, though these are not his words, there was a metaphysical rupture between science as it was created and pursued in the medieval Islamic world, and as it developed in a secularized mode in the modern West. This thesis brings to bear
