
Critical geopolitics: discourse, difference, and dissent

Abstract. In the 1980s international relations theory has been undergoing a major methodological and theoretical debate which has challenged much of the recent disciplinary orthodoxy. This has been inspired by the introduction of contemporary critical social theory and poststructuralist themes into international relations by a new generation of practitioners. Given the close intellectual proximity of international relations to political geography's concerns with geopolitics, these current debates are of great relevance to any attempt to retheorise global politics from the perspective of political geography. Although the recent revival of interest in political geography has led to a considerable interest in rethinking the historiography of the subdiscipline and to reevaluating its tainted past, the necessary accompanying theoretical rethinking has not progressed in a similar fashion. The theoretical issues discussed in the contemporary international relations literature have much to offer political geographers in pursuing this important task.

1 Geography and a world in crisis

As a recent edited collection of essays in geography has it, the world is in crisis (Johnston and Taylor, 1989). Hunger, environmental degradation, war, poverty, premature death, greenhouse effects, ... the tale of woe goes on. Simultaneously the world is astir politically as the cold war systems crumble, economic arrangements change ever more rapidly, new agendas for political action emerge, and the security discourses of the last four decades are increasingly challenged. In the fields of social and political theory too the old certainties are no longer so certain. Signposts (sic!) as to which intellectual direction to follow in these new times are not reliable; positivism and the models of the natural sciences are widely criticised. In this theoretical and political vortex geography in general, and political geography in particular, finds itself searching for direction, facing bigger challenges than ever to say something coherent about what is going on.

In this paper I explore some of the current theoretical controversies 'over the disciplinary fence' in the field of international relations. There, few answers will be easily found; but at least some very interesting questions are available for our perusal and the theoretical debates suggest some critical approaches that may be very useful. The multiplicity of theoretical perspectives and the diversity of methodological projects in international politics parallels some of geography's diverse approaches to contemporary political life. For this reason I explore contemporary discussions there to offer some insight into what geographers might say about the contemporary state of the world in a theoretically and politically informed manner. A secondary purpose in writing this paper is to link arguments made elsewhere (Dalby, 1988; 1990a; 1990b; 1991) about critical geopolitics more explicitly to literatures in geography and in international relations.

A comprehensive analysis of the state of either international relations or political geography is beyond the scope of this paper. In this paper, I do not deal with the material concerned with local and state politics. Neither can I exhaustively discuss all the relevant social theory arguments and literatures. Instead I explore one particular theme, that of the contemporary critical approaches to international studies,
