Introduction

According to De Bruijn et al. (2018), there were numerous studies that associated academic achievement and memory capacity with physical fitness. Their research article extended the existing evidence base by addressing the value of exercise for the development of verbal working memory. Physical exercise became an important mediator intended to explain the relationship between certain fitness approaches and improvements related to a student's memory functioning. It was ultimately found that thorough engagement in exercise might contribute to improved executive functioning as well. De Bruijn et al. (2018) concluded by stating that inhibition and working memory correlated because students could mediate their performance through the interface of fitness. In other words, the development of working memory could be significantly enhanced with the help of physical exercise. The sensitivity of different age groups toward fitness was explored by the researchers only to a limited extent.

Discussion

On the other hand, it was found that regular physical exercise could generate neural alterations in a student's organism. Fitness contributed to improved academic performance across different age groups. In line with De Bruijn et al. (2018), the biggest issue when developing working memory and academic performance is the lack of an exercise program intended to aid the mediating relationship between the two. Thus, not all students might be able to turn their exposure to physical exercise into enhanced memory functioning (De Bruijn et al., 2018). Low academic achievements cannot be paired with weak memory performance or the outstanding physical form of any given student. Exercise should be included in the list of daily activities performed by students in order to develop healthy habits and improve executive functions, including memory. Diverse students should gain access to a varied set of physical exercises for better outcomes.
