

Introduction

Genetic disorders are illnesses that are caused by abnormalities in the genomes of an individual; these disorders are usually present from birth of the person and are usually inherited by being passed from the parents genes. In giving a lecture about genetic disorders, the levels of professionals that the trainees are will determine the manner in which the trainer will conduct the lectures. In addition, due to the difference in age brackets of the trainees, the speed at which they internalise the information will be different. This essay will look at the different forms of methods that are usable in training to ensure both the nursing professionals and the nursing students get all the information that the lecture on genetic disorders is intended to pass on to them (Oermann & Gaberson, 2006).

Lecture Presentation

Nurses who have been in practice for some times tend to be repellent to new ideas and discoveries in the field of genetic disorders, this is because most of the information that they are being presented with is contradictory to the information that they were taught when they were in school or that they have grown up knowing. This therefore, requires that the method that is to be used to teach the adult nurses be convincing enough to make them change their views relating to the specific disorder. This will require the use of real life cases and a lot of research statistics on the cases in order to convince them to change the views and information that they previously held. In the case of students who are pursuing a degree in nursing, accepting new information is easy as they did not have any other contradicting view or information previously. Teaching them will require just the new piece of information and the outdated information may be just for history purposes to show the evolution of information on the subject of genetic disorders.
