✓ Exclusively available on IvyPanda

Philosophy translates as the love of wisdom, so people turn to philosophy to comprehend the truths about themselves and the world, time, relations with the world, and the universal good. Philosophy covers almost all spheres of life, studying their highest necessity ("What is philosophy?" 2021). The academic discipline philosophy is conventionally divided into several branches, among which three are most important – metaphysics, epistemology, and ethics. Metaphysics studies the nature of reality, the structure of the world, the origin of man, God, truth, matter, mind, the connection between mind, body, and free will, and the correlation between events.

Epistemology focuses on studying knowledge, defining what we can know and how we can get that knowledge. The most critical questions from this area include the definition of knowledge, whether a person can know something, how a person knows that they know something, whether we can claim to know certain things. Then, ethics studies, what is right and wrong, and what determines good and bad actions. In other words, ethics answers the questions of what is good and what makes people good, what is right, and what makes actions right, whether morality is objective or subjective.

Therefore, epistemology answers the question "What is knowledge?" presenting various paradoxes about the nature of knowledge; the brightest representative of this branch is Socrates. This scholar once said, "I know that I know nothing," which is an example of an epistemological paradox. At the same time, Aristotle, Plato, and Epictetus asked the question "What is the good life?" and how an individual can achieve it. Aristotle is the most famous and outstanding philosopher who made significant contributions to the development of ethics. In particular, he examined concepts of friendship, love, respect, and ideal relationships between people. The interests of metaphysics are connected with the answer to the question "What is reality made of?" and prominent representatives of this trend are Aristotle, Thomas Aquinas, Emmanuel Kant, Hegel, Friedrich Nietzsche, and many others. In metaphysics, one can notice an opposition between philosophers who relied on logic and those who followed intuition on the path of knowing the truth.
