

Ceremonies in London: Medieval Culture

✓ Exclusively available on IvyPanda

This study examines the historical developments in medieval London, the ceremonies practiced then and the roles these ceremonies played in overall the social setting.

British monarchy was ever so splendid displaying itself in all its finery in the middle centuries. Many of these displays occurred in the pageantries, processions and rituals it held. The best of these were always in London, some of which have transcended time and are still commemorated today. Among these many medieval ceremonies are: 'Trooping the color'; which marks the Queen's official birthday; the 'Order of the Garter'; perhaps the most prestigious oldest (founded by Edward III in 1348) and The State Opening of Parliament are traditions that date back to 15th century and are still held to date.

These ceremonies were used as avenues to address various social concerns. They were tailored to meet special individual and social requirements. For example in the royal ceremonies held at the palace, when the king and his knights met annually for celebration, they also created new knights from people who were considered to be of the most outstanding traits and military minds. (There were women knights known as Lady Companions) They were also available to fulfill the primary role of a bodyguard; that of providing defense of the Sovereign capital and of providing military assistance to the civilian authorities as needed at all ceremonial events.

London's ceremonies were a major tourist attraction. Its court tradition and processions, offered a chance for people to enjoy a real glimpse into the spectacle of pageantry and the sight of ancient traditions that have survived the brunt of time. Through the various ceremonies, 'outsiders' were able to understand the social relations of the urban class and family patterns that were displayed then. In these, the different social networks and strata were evident.

Court pageantry was most visible in the ceremonial entries, weddings and meetings, which were celebrated with extravagant decorations and grand civic tournaments. As a result the ceremonies stimulated growth of local crafts industries, such as the metalwork industry for production of armors and weapons; stone sculpture
