Conceptual and Theoretical Approaches

Any company, at least once in its history, has performed a competitor analysis on marketing channels, the assortment offered, and service conditions. Unlike a one-time comment, reconnaissance is a long-term, systematic, planned, and purposeful activity to study competitors with the help of open sources of information. The information obtained is used to modernize the company's operations, such as changes in internal processes, adjustments in assortment, changes in service conditions, and coordination of advertising activities. During economic crises, competitive intelligence becomes particularly important. A problem is often characterized by a decline in the GDP of the country or countries involved, an increase in unemployment, and a decline in living standards. With declining real disposable income, consumers begin to buy less and choose purchase terms more carefully. In order not to lose customers, companies from one market are forced to enter into the fierce competition, offering what others do not: cheaper and more convenient delivery, shorter delivery times, and more good promotions.

All these innovations need to be launched quickly so companies that conduct competitive research continuously find themselves in a better position. Competitive intelligence is not industrial espionage. It implies collecting and analyzing the information that the competitor does not conceal and makes available to the public. Industrial espionage is an illegal action to obtain information that constitutes a commercial, tax, or banking secret (Article 183 of the Criminal Code). If you try to bring "classified" data by illegal methods (such as wiretapping, stealing essential documents, or threatening employees of a competitor), you may be held criminally liable. If you obtain information from open databases, voluntary surveys, or widely used services, however, the chances of a court judgment are low. Areas of competitive intelligence can be divided into central areas, such as financial, structural, strategic, and technical.
