

Creativity in Science

Scientific Essay

Abstract: Modern science is expected to generate new knowledge and understanding. In this scientific essay, I wish to explore the field of creativity in science by contributing a theoretical perspective on creativity and the creative process, which will include exemplifying different factors that promote or inhibit creativity, as well as reflecting on creativity in my own research project. In addition, I examine how we can help strengthen creativity in the context of discovery in research, then I provide a discussion of the issue.

Keywords: Creativity, science, cultural entrepreneurs

Introduction

Modern science is expected to generate new knowledge and understanding. According to Merton (1942), the institutional goal of science is to extend certified knowledge. This requires new ideas, new hypotheses, and new approaches, not merely the accumulation of more data. Therefore, originality and novelty have been added to the four ethical norms that Merton said comprised the ethos of modern science. Scientists need to be creative, ask new questions, find unexplored areas of inquiry, and look for new interpretations and solutions, but where does creativity come from? Academic preparation as a PhD student involves education and training in both theory and research methods, but little attention has been paid to creativity, which has puzzled me. Why is creativity not more strongly addressed in the context of science, when creativity appears to be a precondition for scientific discoveries and innovations? Maybe this creative neglect can be linked to Popper, an influential 20th century philosopher who made a significant contribution to the debate on what comprises science. He was keen on distinguishing science from pseudoscience, i.e., the so-called demarcation problem. Popper (1963) also
