

“In The Floore and The Leafe the dreamer is curiously disengaged from the action which is observed, a detachment from the literary tradition which in itself points to female authorship.” Do you agree? Discuss.

Dream vision poems often test cultural and poetic conventions, presenting ideas in a way that would not be possible or acceptable in other forms of poetry. It has been widely suggested that The Floore and The Leafe was written by a female author, who demonstrated such ideas in the poem. Evidence for this proposition is found in the detachment that features heavily in the text. The lack of a guide figure until late in the poem, as well as the anonymity of the work are points of the text which have led critics to believe that a female wrote the piece.

Whilst no-one can be certain of the gender of the author of The Floore and The Leafe, the narrator is definitely female: “I saluted her, and bad her good aventure / Must befall, as I could most humbly, / And she answered, “My daughter, gramercy.”¹ The most unusual point about the gender of the dreamer is not that it is in fact a woman, but that her gender is only revealed very late in the poem, when the guide figure greets her. It is implied, up to this point, that the dreamer is male.

One way of thinking about the poem which may provide a clue as to the gender of its author is the consideration of the female perspective. The dreamer has been presented as a female, but does her perspective display emotions and opinions which are analogous to those of females at the time of composition? If this is the case, then the question of the gender of the author is not so important, as the purpose of the poem is to portray a female point of view about love. Wynne Davies asserts that “Not enough of these [women’s own writings] survive
