"Healthy People 2000": An Overview of the National Health Promotion and Disease Prevention Objectives

JAMES O. MASON, MD, DrPH
J. MICHAEL MCGINNIS, MD

ISSUED on September 6, 1990, "Healthy People 2000" (1) challenged the nation to change the health profile of America significantly over the next decade, not through better or more innovative medical treatments, but through prevention.

"Healthy People 2000" aims to increase the span of healthy life and reduce the disparities in health status experienced by different groups of Americans through the prevention of disease and disability.

The challenge to action is conveyed through the national health promotion and disease prevention objectives for the Year 2000, the cornerstone of "Healthy People 2000." These objectives offer a broad range of opportunities for preventive action. Drawing on the combined strength of scientific knowledge, professional skill, individual commitment, community support, and political will, the objectives set a national agenda of shared responsibility for their achievement.

Health promotion, health protection, and preventive services are employed as three broad approaches to improving the health status of the population. Within these three organizing principles, "Healthy People 2000" identifies 22 priority areas and approximately 300 objectives to chart the direction of public health over the next decade (see box). In addition, objectives are established for improved surveillance and data systems, and a cross listing is provided for the objectives according to the age groups that are targeted.

The 1980s

Achievements in health promotion and disease prevention over the past 10 years are evidence that Americans are acting on the belief that individually and collectively they have an element of control over their health and the health of their families. Furthermore, there is a growing awareness that many of our most intractable domestic problems, such as acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (AIDS), drug abuse, or unwanted pregnancies, have a direct bearing on the health of the nation—and that the most promising solutions to these problems are found in prevention.

Dr. Mason is the Assistant Secretary for Health, U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. Dr. McGinnis is Deputy Assistant Secretary for Health (Disease Prevention and Health Promotion) and Director of the Office of Disease Prevention and Health Promotion (ODPHP).

Transmittal requests to ODPHP, 2132 Switzer Bldg., 330 C St. SW, Washington, DC 20201.

Increasingly health is being viewed by citizens and policy makers alike in a broader sense than simply the absence of disease. Rather, health is being perceived as the ability to function fully and independently in society. With this broader concept of health comes a growing social commitment to health. While many Americans question the high costs associated with health care today, they are beginning to recognize the values associated with keeping their schools and work-sites drug free, their highways safe from drunk drivers, and their restaurants smoke free.

During the 1980s, death rates declined for three of the leading causes of death among Americans: heart disease, stroke, and motor vehicle crashes. Infant mortality decreased, and some of the childhood infectious diseases were nearly eliminated. Gains in these areas give hope that the 1990s will see more progress, especially against diseases that have so far not declined, such as cancer.

Much of our progress is attributable to reductions in risk factors. The more than 40 percent decline in heart disease mortality since 1970 reflects dramatic increases in high blood pressure detection and control, the decline in cigarette smoking, and increasing awareness of the role of blood cholesterol and dietary fat. Stroke death rates, which have dropped by more than 50 percent in the same period, also reflect gains in hypertension control and declines in smoking.

Increased use of safety belts, lower speed limits, and declines in alcohol abuse have helped to reduce traffic fatalities by one-third over the past 15 years. Recent reductions in fatal occupational injuries have resulted from enhanced safety standards.

Progress has been made in the health of America's children as well. In 1987, the infant mortality rate reached a record low of 10.1 infant deaths per 1,000 live births. Although still higher than the rate in several other developed countries, this figure represents a 64 percent decline since 1950. The childhood diseases, such as mumps, measles, and rubella, are now rare in this country due to widespread use of vaccines.

Progress in other areas remains mixed. Lung cancer
