Emergence of Clinical Systems and the Role of the Physician

For years, there has been a struggle between the clinicians and the data processing director. When the data processing director was under the control of finance, the clinicians felt their needs were not being met. Minicomputers and excellent new departmental system vendors allowed clinical departments to begin their own computerization efforts. Once computerized, they did not want their systems under the control of the data processing director. Generally, they did their own thing, without consulting or getting help from data processing. Issues of redundancy and lack of integration began to grow with so little communication between clinician and data processing director.

As the CIO concept has matured, many forces have contributed to the growing effort to work closely with physicians and satisfy their critical data needs. Reporting requirements and the need for clinical and physician auditing
