Comprehensive Planning for Healthy Eating and Active Living in Wisconsin Lisa Charron, 2024 Healthy eating and active living HEAL are key targets for public health However most U S adults and children do not eat a healthy diet or get enough physical activity New systems models of HEAL are bringing to light the need to address systems wide drivers of HEAL behaviors Comprehensive plans may be particularly suited to meet this challenge Using the Healthy Living and Active Design Scorecard I evaluated a stratified sample of 116 municipal comprehensive plans from Wisconsin for goals objectives and policies related to HEAL I found that municipalities plan for HEAL to a moderate degree with the highest scores for parks recreation and health care access and the lowest scores for healthy food access and an explicit health focused vision and strategy However even in high scoring areas goals and objectives often lack specific actionable recommendations Using regression analyses I found that the year the comprehensive plan was adopted the primary plan author being a consultant municipal level Democratic voting percentage and having housing and transit identified as a local health priority are consistently associated with better incorporation of HEAL related components Using Welch t tests I also found that when an item in the Scorecard is mandated by state statute it is more likely to be included in local plans I conducted a scoping review to identify interconnections between planning for HEAL and the UN's Sustainable Development Goals SDGs I found interconnections between planning for HEAL and all 17 SDGs I then used multivariate regression analyses to investigate the relationship between comprehensive planning for HEAL and local level indicators for six SDG targets I found that higher planning for HEAL scores are associated with greater walkability target 11 2 park accessibility target 11 7 and food accessibility target 2 1 and lower bicycle and pedestrian danger target 3 6 My results show that there is room for progress in planning for HEAL in Wisconsin Such progress could be facilitated by stronger state level policies the use of consultants and greater collaboration between planning and public health Comprehensive planning for HEAL shows promise as a localized synergy driver or a concrete local level initiative to drive progress on the SDGs
