Excerpt from God Returns to the Vuelta Abajo A Tale of the Cuban Vega

It was the latter part of August when the planters of Old Horseshoe in Vuelta Abajo were making seed beds. At the Sumidero old Bernardo's Vega the men were down in the tumba or clearing some of them turning up long narrow beds in the mellow soil and others burning off more land in preparation. The girl Paula coming out of the palm thatched cottage on the hill above with a tin of coffee for the workers inhaled the pungent odor of smoke with delight. It meant planting time and that is always the Spring of hope to farmers. One forgets that it frequently pleases Heaven to send failure and one remembers the happy years, the years of full harvest. Paula's father Bernardo was the wisest man in the world so if any money were made he was sure to have his share. If the crop went well he had promised her a trip to Consolacion in the ox cart and her choice of all the beautiful hats in town. How wonderful it would be to own a hat. She would be very proud of course but at least she would not put on all the airs Rosita did with her bridal hat. Rosita was absurd and married to such a homely man. Eandres was gaunt and hook nosed with stooped shoulders that made even his wedding suit look queer. And Felicia engaged to poor cross eyed Juanito. How could they do it of course. Mamita had told Paula that love is blind to such imperfections that love beautifies. But Paula did not care to experiment with these miracles. She paused for a moment under the ceiba tree and whispered a prayer to San Antonio to send her a handsome husband. Forgetful of the tin of cooling coffee she looked out over the scene of tropical loveliness dreaming. Beyond were the blue green mountains with their deep purple shadows the foothills already dotted with brown newly plowed fields the winding road and then directly below her the lagoon repeating the whole picture upside down. As she gazed into this crystal mirror a horseman a stranger to her rounded the turn in the road and appeared reflected in the tranquil water. He was riding at a logging gait that covered the ground rapidly but on seeing the girl under the ceiba tree he reined in his horse sharply and stared up at her after the frank fashion of the Cubans. There was something about this stranger that made Paula's breath come quickly. She looked up from the reflection and gazed into his amber colored eyes. She felt a strange excitement and then it was as if a part of herself her soul maybe left her body and rushed across the space called by the same part of him. The feeling was so strange that she shivered so new to her that she was afraid as if the whole fabric of her simple life were threatened. And her innermost being seemed to call out to her telling her there was something she must say to this man. She wanted to call out to him. Stop. Wait till I understand. Wait till I find out what it is. I must say to you. One does not speak in that way to strangers and Paula turned red under her tan. She started guiltily remembering her errand and hurried down to the tumba.
