Bureau of Land Management, 2001 Fire Management Today , 2002 Severe Wildland Fires United States. General Accounting Office, 2002 Dangerous accumulations of brush small trees and other vegetation on federal lands particularly in the western United States have helped fuel devastating wildfires in recent years Although a single focal point is critical for directing firefighting efforts by federal state and local governments GAO found a lack of clearly defined leadership at the federal level Authority and responsibility remain fragmented among the Department of the Interior the Forest Service and the states Implementation of a performance accountability network also remains fragmented As a result GAO could not determine if the 796 million earmarked for hazardous fuels reduction in 2001 and 2002 has been targeted to communities and areas at highest risk The five federal land management agencies the National Park Service the Fish and Wildlife Service the Bureau of Land Management the Bureau of Indian Affairs and the Forest Service have yet to begin the research needed to identify and prioritize vulnerable communities near high risk federal lands Moreover the agencies are not collecting the data needed to determine if changes are needed to expedite the project planning process They also are not collecting data needed to measure the effectiveness of efforts to dispose of the large amount of brush and other vegetation on federal lands Remote Sensing Applications Act of 2004 United States.
