Europe and its Others Iva Dodevska, 2025-08-13 This open access book joins other critical works that draw attention to the ways integration is debated legislated conceptualized monitored evaluated and ultimately normalized as a mode of governance Situated at the interstices of migration studies European studies and the social studies of science the book examines the role of social scientific research EU policy and research policy collaboration in shaping the migrant integration paradigm in Europe Amidst heated debates on immigration and migrant integration the European Union becomes an increasingly relevant actor where important resources are earmarked for the implementation of civic integration measures as well as for producing evidence to guide policy Simultaneously a prolific scholarship attempts to understand measure and compare how and whether immigrants are integrated into society often in the effort to remain policy relevant Interested primarily in integrationism as a technique of power the book takes a decolonial and genealogical approach to understand how integrationist discourses that are produced at these two sites research and EU policy are situated within wider and intersecting systems of hierarchy The main argument is that the politics of integration research and the scientific claims in evidence based policy intersect to produce integration as the hegemonic paradigm in governing migration related diversity in Europe Through discourse analysis of research publications policy documents media statements as well as an analysis of the EU s science for policy community the book examines how integration comes to be seen simultaneously as a political problem and an object of scientific fascination how integration is regulated at supranational EU level and through science policy collaboration and what are the effects of integrationism as a rationality of governance on its target subjects Ultimately the book shows that the practices of regulating governing measuring theorizing and monitoring the integration of immigrants are shaped by power dynamics linked to the preservation of European liberal subjecthood against rapid demographic social political and environmental shifts
