

In the thirty splendid novels that Dell Shannon has now written about Lt. Luis Mendoza, the highly unusual head of the Los Angeles Homicide Division, he and his men have solved a great many cases, but on the whole have managed to keep out of the headlines. Now, however, he becomes a hero in all the papers, for dashing into a burning house and rescuing a most ungrateful cat. He is greatly embarrassed by all the publicity, and his men are hugely amused.

And of course he faces the usual battery of serious crimes, among them some of the most shocking of his career: a young divorcée murdered by her ex-husband's lover; a nine-year-old girl raped and strangled; a woman abducted and savagely brutalised. Half a million dollars is stolen from a fashionable department store, in what seems like a flawless robbery; and a harmless old man is killed for twelve dollars. Shops are being held up at gunpoint by a beautiful blonde. Religious fanaticism triggers a horrifying double murder.

Meanwhile, Mendoza's wife pursues her plan to move the family out to an estate in the country. He's fairly resigned about it until she starts buying sheep. Then there's more fun ahead.
