

nutrition. The first section deals with indications, the physiology of absorption, the metabolism of the various nutrients and some practical aspects. All chapters are well written, but leave one in the air regarding the clinical value of enteral nutrition.

The second section covers patient assessment, nutritional support, special situations and, finally, complications. It should be noted that complications do occur with what would appear to be a very simple technique.

This is a good and useful account of the symposium held in October 1978 on enteral nutrition.

Cancer Immunotherapy and its Immunological Basis (GANN Monograph on Cancer Research No. 21) Y Yamamura et al. (ed) pp 260 £26.95 Tokyo: Japan Scientific Societies Press and Baltimore: University Park Press 1979

This well-produced monograph, published with the backing of the Japanese Cancer Association, contains a fascinating account of the current status of cancer immunotherapy in Japan. The results show a remarkable similarity to those obtained in the West. Dr W Terry from the US National Cancer Institute provides a concluding essay which underlines the spectacular failure of this particular form of treatment so far. He rightly points out that there is no form of immunotherapy that can be recommended as the treatment of choice in any form of cancer. His subsequent plea for a more rigorous scientific appraisal of the topic, for properly controlled clinical trials and an extension of basic laboratory research is well argued.

Expense will no doubt limit this volume to specialist libraries. Anyone thinking of setting up clinical trials of immunotherapy for treating cancer will be well advised to seek it out.

Stress Disorders among Vietnam Veterans C R Figley (ed) pp 356 $21.45 New York: Raven Press 1978

This book describes the Vietnam war as being fought in a 'technological blizzard' and a 'moral vacuum'. The veterans of this war felt that, unlike the American veterans of previous wars, they were viewed as deviates by those at home. The war itself was a long one, civilians were involved in the fighting and, perhaps more significantly, it was one that America lost. These factors created problems over and above those experienced by veterans of the two world wars.

The first section of the book deals with theoretical issues relating to the nature of combat stress and its effects, and emphasizes that the emotional content of combat continues for the rest of the soldier's life. The general reader may find the second section on related research somewhat detailed, particularly with the full questionnaires which are given. The research includes many studies relating to the readjustment of the veteran and the prisoner of war.

The last section dealing with treatment raises the question of who the person giving treatment was serving – the army or the soldier. The psychotherapists in this study took considerable pains to consider their patients' interests as pre-eminent and to ensure that their armour of professionalism did not block communication. One of the most effective forms of treatment appeared to be 'rap groups' – a form of group therapy. The debates on the professional role and the technician mechanical model versus the humanistic one make the book well worth reading by anyone with an interest in psychotherapy.

Female and Male Climacteric: current opinion 1978. P A van Keep et al. (ed) pp 146 £6.75 Lancaster: MTP Press 1979

This book contains the moderators' reports from the workshops at the Second International Congress on the Menopause held in Jerusalem in June 1978. Most of the recognized international authorities on the climacteric were present and provided contributions on all aspects of the subject. Of particular importance were the sessions concerned with the risks of oestrogen therapy and especially that with the potential development of endometrial carcinoma. Several clinical studies emphasized the protective effect of the addition of a progestogen on the endometrium and this was supported by studies of intracellular hormone activity, from which the safest regimen of treatment may eventually be identified.

Evidence for a male climacteric was discussed in only one of the 12 workshops and the conclusion was that it probably does not exist!

This is an inexpensive but comprehensive summary of current opinion on the climacteric and will provide interesting reading and a valuable reference book for all who are concerned with the special problems of the middle years.
