

- I. Introduction to the Psychology of Time

- Time is both an objective reality, as well as a subjective psychological construct

- Time could be defined as the physical measurement of motion (ie, the measurement of the motion of the earth around the sun),

- Time is also a psychological construct

- Examples:

- "A watched pot never boils" = the seeming prolongation of less enjoyable experiences

- "Time flies when you're having fun" is indicative of the psychological phenomenon whereby perception of time is directly proportional to our perceived level of enjoyment in the present task.

Global Perspectives on the Ecology of Human-Machine Systems John M. Flach, Peter A. Hancock, Jeff Caird, Kim J. Vicente, 2018-04-20 There is a growing consensus in the human factors ergonomics community that human factors research has had little impact on significant applied problems Some have suggested that the problem lies in the fact that much HF E research has been based on the wrong type of psychology an information processing view of psychology that is reductionistic and context free Ecological psychology offers a viable alternative presenting a richer view of human behavior that is holistic and contextualized The papers presented in these two volumes show the conceptual impact that ecological psychology can have on HF E as well as presenting a number of specific examples illustrating the ecological approach to human machine systems It is the first collection of papers that explicitly draws a connection between these two fields While work in this area is only just beginning the evidence available suggests that taking an ecological approach to human factors ergonomics helps bridge the existing gap between basic research and applied problems
