

REGIONAL VARIATIONS OF TORAH CASES FROM THE ISLAMIC WORLD

Broche Yonai

Since the destruction of the Second Temple in 70 C.E., the Torah (the five books of Moses) has been of supreme value to Judaism, and the Torah scroll written on parchment has been Judaism's most sacred object. Such heavily decorated cases and coverings, going far to protect them, concerning Torah scrolls and their treatment. These have been collected in two of the so-called "major treatises" of the Oral Law canon, respectively Seder Berakot and Seder Shema (Turk Shema), both dated around the seventh century C.E. Information concerning some ceremonial objects used to protect the scrolls, and especially the sacred scroll system in the main works of the Oral Law, the Mishnah and the Talmud, which were written before the major treatises. This information, however, is scattered throughout numerous works with other topics. Since ceremonial objects developed over a long period, only some of them are mentioned in these works, mainly in the context of the various of carrying, storing, and displaying and so on. While the laws pertaining to the Torah scroll itself were crystallized quite early, there is no direct reference in these works to the form of ceremonial objects associated with Torah scrolls. Consequently, these ceremonial objects display a great variety of designs.

One expression of this variety is found in the two types of covering used for Torah scrolls—the dark "wraps" generally used in European communities, including the Sephardim, and the wooden case typically appearing in Western Asia and Eastern Mediterranean communities (Fig. 1). The case is characteristically cylindrical or conical, with an opening in the front. Either if or not, there are considerable variations in shape from community to community. These variations may be classified broadly into three types.

The first type is represented by a box-like case, shown both front and wrapped in a protective cloth (Figs. 1, 2). Such cases are generally made of wood—natural, painted and covered. They have a flat top with two holes for the straps on which the scrolls are kept. Pivots on the sides are fitted. The box-like case placed a piece of cloth, called a talit, between the scrolls. (This Hebrew word originally meaning "garment" was designated the cloth worn by Jewish men while praying.)

The second, so-called Babylonian type is that used by the Jews of Iraq, western Iran and the daughter communities of Iraq (very many in India, Syria, Lebanon and Egypt, Fig. 2). The body of the Babylonian case is made of bent or painted wood and is covered with leather, velvet, wool or a combination of these materials. Characteristics of these cases is the spherical or cone-shaped crown capping the case with diagonal ribs for the finish. It is also customary to hang, using the piece of cloth, a cord or ribbon as support (Fig. 2).
