Mahy, 2005-10-28 Foot and mouth disease FMD has been recognized in printed records dating from the sixteenth century and since the eradication of rinderpest cattle plague in the early part of the twentieth century it has been recognized as the most important and feared disease of cattle and other domestic livestock The beginning of the twenty first century brought the worst outbreak of FMD ever experienced in England which had been completely free of the disease for 33 years This tragic epidemic which spread to Northern Ireland Scotland France and the Netherlands with severe economic consequences emphasized the need for further research into better methods for the detection and control of the disease FMD is caused by a small RNA virus which is highly contagious and can survive in meat and other animal products for long periods at normal pH levels The virus typically infects cloven hoofed animals including cattle goats pigs and sheep as well as a wide range of non domesticated animals in regions of the world where FMD virus is endemic such as the African continent There are seven recognized serotypes of FMD virus with numerous subtypes and as a consequence vaccine production and administration is complex and a major debate surrounds every disease outbreak regarding the relative merits of vaccination as opposed to the slaughter of all infected animals
