

Religious Freedom: The Separation Between Church and State

Topic: Religion | Words: 622 | Pages: 2

Many individuals are afraid that the country's Christian heritage is being attacked. Even if the menace is more fictitious than accurate, it has prompted prominent religious politicians and leaders to call into question the separation between church and state. Many conservatives see attempts to divide religion and state as an attack on the Religious majority in America. On the other hand, many progressives see the separation between church and state as purely political, a means of protecting the government from religious involvement.

The views of Jefferson and James Madison on division have historically been contested. During his administration, Jefferson declined to issue Thanksgiving Proclamations provided to him by Parliament; however, he decided to issue a Thanksgiving and Prayer declaration while Governor of Virginia. At the same time, Governor Madison made four religious declarations but rejected two pieces of legislation on the basis that they infringed on the first Constitution (Madison). Jefferson and Madison both joined church ceremonies in the Senate on the other side. Jefferson's adversaries said that his attitude was one of devastation and governmental repudiation of Christianity, but this was a misunderstanding. Jefferson urged all faiths to have their preachers while establishing the UV, despite a statutory limitation on the state funding a Professorship of Divinity coming from his own Virginia Statute for Religious Liberty.

The strategy used by Jefferson and Madison was not the only one used in those times. Jefferson's Law of Religious Freedom was written in
