PREFACE THIS book is intended for classes and for individual readers who possess a light general knowledge of geography A map of Ireland should always be at hand and a teacher will easily give help to pupils in the matters dealt with in the first five chapters Ten or twelve specimens of the chief rocks that build up Ireland should be part of the equipment of the school and some of these can be well collected by the class The description of the country in Chapters VI to IX contains a number of local details which may arouse interest when the reader says to himself I have seen that or I know that very corner The teacher may well begin with the country round about the school and may mention a great many of its surface features aided by the Ordnance maps beyond what is briefly touched on here Old traditions and historic events add greatly to the interest of such descriptions and the beautiful Irish place names which are so often ruined by the spelling on our maps constantly remind us of the curves of hill and dale or connect the land form with the movements of man with fights and forays or with the establishment of seats of learning in the past Books like P W Joyce's Irish Names of Places and Short history of Ireland and J Chokes edition of ciurrays Ireland readily suggest themselves as guides But the history of Ireland goes far back beyond what man has written and is bound up with that of the great globe itself Those who live Ireland should know their country well If these few pages should help anyone to know and love it better the author will have received his best reward The Earth is a great ball 7 gm miles across or 25 000 miles when measured round about Ireland is a patch of land on its surface surrounded by water measuring about 250 miles from north to south and 180 miles from east to west
