

GALENA-SPHALERITE MINERALIZATION NEAR PALMER LAKE, NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

M.P. Cecile and D.W. Morrow
Institute of Sedimentary and Petroleum Geology, Calgary

Introduction

Significant sphalerite and galena mineralization was discovered in Ordovician to Devonian carbonates at one locality near Palmer Lake during stratigraphic and sedimentological field studies (1977) of Paleozoic strata in the Mackenzie Mountains, Northwest Territories. This mineralization is located within 10 km of three other occurrences in carbonates of the same age. Sphalerite was also discovered in the Road River Formation 25 km south-southeast of this mineralization.

Stratigraphy and Location

The mineralization is located at 64°30' and 123°53' (713600N, 453000E) in U.T.M. co-ordinates, 5 km north of the Mountain River, and will hence be referred to as the Mountain River occurrence (Fig. 1). Coarsely crystalline sphalerite and galena occur sporadically in vugs that are scattered in Ordovician to Devonian carbonates of the Moon Kintie, Delorme, and Arctica Formations and as massive sphalerite and minor galena in veins cutting the Delorme Formation (Figs. 2-5). All three Formations overlie the Cambrian to Ordovician Road River and transitional (to basal) Franklin Mountain Formations, on the northeastern edge of the lower Paleozoic Muddy Creek Embayment, just north of an area of Ordovician and Silurian volcanic hills (Cecile, 1978). Within 5 km of Mountain River three claim groups with Zn-Pb mineralization in Silurian to Devonian carbonates have been staked by Wilcoxon North (Dawson, 1973). The Mountain River mineralization occurs adjacent to outcrops of the lower Cambrian Solon Formation that have been staked, in the past, for zinc and sphalerite mineralization.

In ascending stratigraphic order the stratigraphy of the Mountain River occurrence is 73 m of vuggy, medium crystalline, thick bedded, dark and light grey dolomites of the Mount Kintie Formation which rest unconformably on transitional shaly dolomites of the Franklin Mountain Formations 150 m of vuggy thick bedded, massive, light grey, dolomitic dolomite, and 30 m of yellow and orange silty dolomite and sandstone which rest unconformably on the Mount Kintie Formation and together constitute the Delorme Formation 125 m of thick bedded petroclastic brown-grey dolomite interbedded with medium light grey beds of the Arctica Formation which lie conformably on the Delorme Formation (Fig. 2).

Description of the Mountain River Mineralization

The Mountain River mineralization occurs as secondary sphalerite and galena in vugs or veins. Most vug mineralization is in the lower transitional Delorme Formation (Fig. 3). Regionally, horizontal dolomites are typical within strata of the Delorme Formation. In the Arctica Formation mineralization is also associated with vuggy dolomitic beds (Fig. 4) but is widely scattered. Some Arctica dolomites are mineralized exclusively with galena whereas others are mineralized exclusively with sphalerite. In the Mount Kintie Formation galena fillings occur in a set of vugs breaching subparallel to the bedding.

Vein mineralization was only observed cutting rocks of the Delorme Formation (Fig. 5). Mineralized veins are filled with 10 to 100 cm of coarsely crystalline dolomite in sharp planar contact with 2 to 10 cm of reddish yellow, massive sphalerite both surrounded by discontinuous pods and veins of galena.

Veins trend west-northeast-east-southeast and appear to be re-sheared. Trends are perpendicular to the dip-slope of the older Muddy Creek Embayment (Cecile, 1978). Because veins occur over transitional facies of the embayment this trend may relate to dilatational fracturing caused by differential compaction of thick basinal shaly strata and adjacent thin shaly carbonate strata. However this trend is also subparallel to thrust faults in the embayment zone and may instead relate to post-fracturing stress relaxation.

Small amounts of pyroclastics were found in the Road River Formation near the Mountain River occurrence, and in the Mount Kintie and Franklin Mountain Formations 10 km south-west and north of the Mountain River occurrence, respectively. Calcite fractures filled with sphalerite were found at the base of the Road River Formation 25 km south-southeast of the Mountain River occurrence (64°20'N and 123°45'W).

The Mountain River occurrence has many of the features of other Rocky Mountain Zn-Pb showings, according to the characteristics of Rocky Mountain Zn-Pb deposits listed by Macgibbon (1976, p. 72-73). Features in common are the mineralization is hosted in porous dolomites; barren occurs in associated rock; mineralization occurs in open space; large mineralization occurs with a planar carbonate to basinal shale facies change; and the host rocks are unmetamorphosed. The Mountain River occurrence differs with the typical Rocky Mountain showing in that it occurs over a large stratigraphic range (Fig. 2); it has vein mineralization; and it is at least spatially associated with basic volcanic hills.
