

Estimating excess winter mortality in England and Wales

Helen Johnson and Clare Griffiths,
Office for National Statistics

INTRODUCTION

England and Wales, in common with other European countries, experiences higher levels of mortality in the winter than in the summer. A measure of this increase is provided, on an annual basis, in the form of the excess winter mortality figure. This figure is a simple way to assess mortality levels over the winter as a whole and can be used as a basis for comparison with previous years. The EWM index (excess winter deaths divided by the average non-winter deaths expressed as a percentage) can be used as a comparison with other countries. There is evidence that EWM is to some extent preventable. Recent research that aimed to identify measures that could reduce excess winter mortality levels in England and Wales has focused on indoor temperature (adequate home heating)¹ and measures to reduce outdoor cold stress (keeping warm while outdoors).²

Lower temperatures in winter are responsible for some deaths. The Eurowinter Group³ in their study of winter mortality in Europe found that mortality increased, in a broadly linear way, with each fall in mean daily temperature below 18°C. Mortality during winter increases more in England and Wales than other European countries with colder climates.^{3,4} This finding suggests that factors, other than temperature alone, contributed to higher levels of excess winter mortality in England and Wales.

The Eurowinter Group³ looked at possible explanations for greater increases in mortality, for a given fall in temperature, in regions with warm winters (for example, England and Wales) compared with other European countries with colder winters. Findings were that regions with warm winters had cooler homes and took fewer protective measures against the cold, such as wearing warm clothing when outdoors. Indoor

During the winter months, mortality in England and Wales reaches higher levels than during the summer months. The aim of calculating an excess winter mortality figure is to measure this annual increase. For each winter, excess winter mortality (EWM) is calculated in the same way, using an arbitrarily defined winter period. Over the last 50 years, in December to March mortality levels have remained above average and in May to October mortality has been consistently below average. There has been a steady log-linear decline in EWM. Although year-on-year variability, which is most pronounced in the winter months, remains. In general, the current ONS method of estimating EWM gives similar results to other methods of calculating EWM over the last 50 years. However, due to the year-on-year variability seen in seasonal mortality, mortality can also be above average in the autumn or spring. Where these periods are included in the comparison period for excess winter mortality calculations, as with the current ONS method, this has the effect of decreasing the EWM estimate.

Ageing Great Britain: Parliament: House of Lords: Science and Technology Committee, 2005-07-21 In the 2001 census there were more people over 65 than under 16 for the first time and 20 per cent of the UK population is expected to be over 65 years of age by 2020 Consideration of this trend normally looks negatively at the economic costs and social problems involved rather than the biological and psychological processes and so this report approaches the subject from a scientific perspective Firstly it examines the demographic background Then it considers why and how ageing occurs the ageing process and the natural degeneration of the human body and mind over time and looks at those diseases which are particularly prevalent in old age There are exciting developments in biological research into the causes of ageing and into what can be done to slow the adverse effects of the ageing process and improve the quality of life of older people In the case of the individual diseases which predominantly affect older people research is also showing promising avenues of development in prevention and treatment Next the report examines the environmental challenges assistive technology and the failure of industry to seize the opportunity to exploit the underdeveloped market that the elderly represent The Committee comments here on the failure to apply existing technologies rather than the pace of new developments The report also covers management by the Government of health in old age both for the individual and for society as a whole and the strategic direction and coordination of ageing related research It finds that research is being inhibited by two main factors which are the responsibility of the Government the treatment of the scientific aspects of ageing as very much the junior partner in any consideration of older people and a lack of coordination in particular between the research councils
