

NATURE AND CHARACTERISTICS OF RIVER TERRACES

River terraces are among the most important characteristics of the shape of many valleys in the Himalayas. Individual spreads of terrace surfaces are small—forming horizontal or gently-inclined breaks in the valley-side slopes. Sometimes they are no more than a ledge recognizable only to the practised eye. In other cases, they are of considerable breadth, apparent at the first sight, and form a prominent feature of the physiognomy of the river valley.

Types of River Terraces

River terraces, in varying degrees of preservation extend along the sides of valleys and determine their cross-profile. They can be distinguished from the stepped longitudinal profile of mountainous valleys (especially those in the Himalayas and the Alps). A two-fold characteristic can be observed among the terraces. The first involves their composition. Many are formed in the bedrock of the valley side and carry little or no gravel upon them; these are 'rock' or 'strath' terraces. Others, in contrast, are built of gravel, of heavy thickness, descending to the valley floor or at least resting on bedrock only at some considerable depth. These are 'alluvial' or 'gravel terraces. Since the second characteristic depends upon the size of sediment, it is more difficult to interpret, but genetically still more significant, and this is of first importance in distinguishing rock terraces from gravel terraces. Some rock-terraces, often covered by a thin veneer of gravels, run roughly parallel with the valley floor, rather like the surface of gravel terraces. But unlike gravel terraces, they truncate the strata, unless by chance the strata have the same low inclination as the valley floor, and show no relation. In this case, the base of many of the terraces is determined for a short distance by a rock ledge. The terraces of Alpine valleys as showed by Rutimeyer in 1869, and the terraces of the Rhine valley in the Rhine Massif, are of this type. The other kind has nothing to do with the valley floor, but is more or less markedly inclined in the opposite direction and generally coincides with particular beds or other structural surfaces. They are extra-ordinarily common on a small scale, less frequent on a larger one, as they can occur on a large scale only on more moderately inclined strata beds. The first kind are old valley floors, corresponding to a halt in erosion and the formation of a wide valley floor. They are termed terraces of erosional stillstand or simply erosion terraces. The other type have nothing to do with erosion, but are developed by weathering and denudation. They are called
