

TUDOR AND STUART SOLID OAK AND WALNUT FURNITURE

19. A carved walnut day-bed. This piece of furniture formed the bulk of the Jacobean time. The back was usually made to fall back between the two uprights so that it could be adjusted for the comfort of the user, chains and pegs being supplied so that it could be fixed at any angle. In the best of these there is a carved bottom rail on both sides. They were made matching the chairs of the date, but are not very common. In the succeeding age this form of couch was replaced by covers of both the chair and stuffed-back types, but the oak disappeared until almost modern times. In only one instance have I ever met with a day-bed or chair longer at last type, and this was a very early specimen of spoon-back—William and Mary.

20. Another early, though not so early, oak chair as the grandfather one already shown in this section. In this example the bent-rim remains, but the chair has already developed in the direction of ultimately oak, although here the back and sides only are pointed, and the piece in other respects, save in amplitude, differs little from the ordinary cross-back arm.

21. A cross-back chair of later date, and probably contemporary with much of the furniture of the Dutch type. The back and seat are narrower, and the dossier has become much higher. The centre panel has assumed a form more approaching that of the spoon-back, though the rest of the chair still retains the features of the broad walnut chair.

22. This table belongs more to the succeeding period of the Dutch influence. The same design is often found as the last both of chairs of drawers and cabinets of that date. The various bell-shaped ornaments in the legs are specially features of the last style.

23. A curious small oak game table with one flap and one leg. The top is solid with carvings of simple geometrical design.
