market and policy changes requires more than just a calorie focus This work extends the traditional perspective and analyzes the effects of income food price and sociodemographic developments on vitamin and mineral adequacies at the household level The author proposes two approaches to estimate income and price elasticities of nutrient consumption and presents a procedure for assessing the nutrition situation in populations based on food consumption data Using both approaches demand models are applied in two empirical studies with data from rural East Africa and Malawi Results suggest that the nutritional status is highly income responsive Price elasticities are lower in absolute values albeit with notable differences between nutrients Policy implications are discussed Bibliography of Agriculture ,1975 An Analysis of Poverty, Inequality, and Consumer Behavior in Romania with Implications for Tax Policy Chad D.
