Reviews and Short Biography of Hooke by
Keith Montgomery
University of Wisconsin – Marathon County

Popular scientific biographies cannot be expected to make a complete exposition and assessment of their subject's work: such would require specialist treatment directed at a different audience. Assessing the scientific contributions of Robert Hooke (1635-1703) is notably difficult because he contributed significantly to the development of scientific knowledge in so many fields, and he was so prolific with ideas and suggestions that partisans of his genius can usually find something in his writing to confirm their faith. It is clear, for example, that the Newton specialist Richard Westfall (1969) brings considerably greater critical power to bear upon Hooke's physics than upon his geology. At the same time, Drake (1981, 1996) and Drake and Komar (1983) are almost uncritical champions of the view that Hooke, single-handedly and without credit, was the founder of modern geology.

As Curator of Experiments for the Royal Society (1662-1677), Secretary of the Royal Society (1677-1682), Gresham Professor of Geometry (1665-1703), and Cutlerian Lecturer in Mechanics (1664-1703), Robert Hooke contributed to developments in astronomy, biology, mechanics, meteorology, optics, and geology. His ideas in optics and celestial mechanics, although rarely worked through to a complete, conclusive mathematical demonstration (see Westfall 1969), prefigured Newton's mathematical and experimental triumphs, and he dogged Newton with claims of plagiarism; hence, ultimately, he became a victim, both in life and death, of Newton's wrath and almost boundless vindictiveness (see 'Espinasse 1956, and Gleick 2003). While, earlier, Newton had graciously admitted the influence of others' ideas in his thinking about optics, including Hooke's, allowing that "If I have seen further, it is by standing on the shoulders of giants" (1676), later, concerning Hooke's claim to priority in universal gravitation and the inverse-square law, Newton wrote of Hooke as someone who "should have excused himself by reason of his inability," someone who "does nothing but pretend and grasp" — "a man of strange and unsociable temper" (1686). Newton then: deleted a reference to "the Most Illustrious Hooke" from a draft of Book III of the "Principia" and added a prominent and glowing mention of Wren, Wallis, and Huygens (Gleick 2003, note 6, p.224); delayed publication of his "Opticks" (1704) until after Hooke's death "To avoid being engaged in disputes;" and, finally, on becoming President of the Royal Society, again after Hooke's death, is said to have destroyed the only portrait of Hooke believed to have existed (but see Jardine 2004, for a possible discovery).

Hooke's inventions and improvements were numerous and highly ingenious and included the iris diaphragm, the universal joint, the compound microscope, the wheel barometer, and the basic mechanism for the pocket watch (over which he had a patent dispute with Huygens). Hooke's version of the vacuum air pump was a wonder of its time and in his Oxford days (1657-1662) as Robert Boyle's assistant he had much to do with Boyle's formulation of his famous gas law. He was also appointed City Surveyor of London (1666-1676) following the Great Fire, in which capacity he laid out and oversaw the execution of the new street plan and contributed in the design of buildings, including some churches formerly attributed to Wren (Inwood 2003, pp.124-127): and it was Hooke who designed the Monument to the Great Fire. For all this, he is probably known to most
