

Forty Lost Years: The Apartheid State and the Politics of the National Party 1948-1994, by Dan O'Meara. Johannesburg: Ravan Press; Athens: Ohio University Press, 1996.

Reviewed by Gerhard Maré, University of Natal

This long work follows chronologically and thematically on O'Meara's earlier, and in terms of length more modest, Volkskapitalisme (Johannesburg: Ravan Press, 1983). The earlier study examined the development of Afrikaner nationalism, 1934-48, and the way in which the notion of a "people's capitalism" was used to mobilize Afrikaners towards gaining state power. This theme forms the background to the book under review. Through 22 chapters and a 68-page "theoretical appendix," O'Meara takes the reader on a necessary journey of the apartheid years, not of the horrors of that policy in its implementation, but of the white Afrikaner men who devised it and ensured that implementation over forty "lost years."

During that time, even when in the mid-1980s it was acknowledged that the policy had largely failed, "nothing else was on offer, no long term vision of how to proceed" beyond the apartheid policy itself (p. 326). The formulators had over forty years become entrapped within the limitations caused by near-absolute power, by the paranoia of a "total onslaught" against what was presented as a unique situation demanding unique solutions, the extremes of what had been done to millions of fellow South Africans, and the rejection by nearly all black people of any imposed "solution."

Forty Lost Years is, in the first place, a fine and historically complex study of a political party and politicians in power, examining style, shifting power balances, decision-making processes, personality conflicts and the role of the individual in shaping larger processes, and class representation, in often overwhelming detail. While there are clearly some very pertinent generalizations to be drawn from this study, O'Meara hardly ever does so himself. The book remains a study of a specific political party, the National Party in South Africa, with its specific policy, apartheid. It will serve an invaluable function in pulling together material provided by a range of fragmentary secondary sources, as well as some primary material, in documenting a terrible period in South Africa's history. That period finally ended with the announcement by the sixth and last post-1948 National Party leader, F. W. de Klerk, in February, 1990, that the old order was no more, that it had become untenable and indefensible.

The book also examines the form of the state. O'Meara notes (p. 62) that the "etatist political culture of Christian-nationalism had never accepted the state-as-arbiter mythology inherited with the British
