The Economic Geography of the Tourist Industry Keith G. Debbage, Dimitri Ioannides, 1998-04-02 The Economic Geography of the Tourist Industry bridges the gap between tourism research and economic geography by bringing together leading academics in geography planning and tourism The authors explain tourism's definitions and examine whether tourism can be categorized as an industry They provide detailed analyses of key sectors such as tour Geography of the Tourist Industry by U.S. Metropolitan Area Omer Abdalla Omer, 2010 The research in this dissertation articulates the economic geography of the tourist industry in the United States by metropolitan statistical area MSA from a supply side perspective It examines the complex economic mix of the tourism production system by employment patterns number of establishments and wages One of the key purposes of this dissertation is to analyze the intense geographical concentration that underlies the tourist industry and to identify the typologies of metropolitan based economies that explain much of the clusters A key hypothesis is that although the tourism direct providers e q hotels airlines etc attract more attention in the tourism geography literature than tourism supply service industries e g food and drinking services performing arts etc that a broad economic equivalence exists between these macro sectors in terms of number of jobs and establishments by MSA Overall it is hypothesized that the tourism production system is largely shaped by the logic of agglomeration theory and that metropolitan area economies that experience high levels of specialization as expressed by elevated tourism related market shares in terms of jobs and establishments will also generate a higher overall tourism average wage Another purpose of this dissertation was to examine the overall impact of tourism specialization on quality of life scores as indicated by per capita income percent of population with college degrees and population growth rates Furthermore the dissertation examined whether metropolitan area economies that attract disproportionately high levels of tourism market share in terms of employment also attract disproportionate creative class employment based on Florida s 2002 definition The overall analysis revealed that a broad economic equivalency in terms of number of jobs and number of establishments exists between tourism direct providers e g air transportation and hotels and the tourism supporting services e g restaurants performing arts and sports Additionally the findings highlighted an acute geographic concentration of the tourism production system The top ten MSAs in terms of employment market share accounted for 40% of all tourism jobs The analysis also revealed that four major tourism MSA typologies existed including casino based coastal resort retirement resorts and natural resource gateway metropolitan areas The findings further revealed that tourism average wages varied by MSA and they were highly influenced by the level of tourism concentration and specialization partly due to an economies of scale and agglomeration effect The analysis supported the notion that the tourism industry s overall impact on various quality of life indicators was largely random suggesting that the general notion that tourism can be a panacea for an urban economies ill needs to be re evaluated and questioned The analysis also showed that a random relationship existed between tourism employment levels and the percent creative class employment contrary to much of the literature Additionally the analysis also suggested that a statistically significant correlation existed between percent creative class employment and cultural tourism employment e g performing arts spectator sports etc Suggesting that targeting culturally oriented tourism amenities may be a more effective strategy to attract the creative class Data sets for the dissertation came from different sources including The Bureau of Economic Analysis BEA The Bureau of Labor Statistics BLS and The Census Bureau The North American Industrial Classification System NAICS methodology was used to quantify the tourist industry from a supply side perspective Abstract from author supplied metadata Economic Geography of Tourism João Romão, 2025-05-13 This book provides an in depth exploration of the dynamic intersections between economic geography and tourism highlighting how spatial economic and social processes shape tourism development and how tourism in turn transforms economic spaces Combining theoretical insights with real world case studies it offers a comprehensive understanding of tourism's evolving role within economic geography. The first part lays a strong theoretical foundation introducing key concepts such as the Tourism Area Life Cycle path dependence agglomeration economies smart specialization and regional resilience within the context of tourism research It explores spatial and temporal patterns in tourism development the growing influence of digitalization and smart tourism and the roles of innovation and competitiveness in shaping destination dynamics The second part shifts focus to tourism s broader economic and social implications It critically assesses urban tourism s links to gentrification circular economies and social conflicts while exploring strategies to address spatial enclaves and foster integrated tourism networks in low density and fragile regions Environmental challenges including the impact of tourism mobility on local communities and ecosystems are also examined The book concludes by addressing the tensions and future trajectories of tourism development questioning whether sustainable or regenerative tourism can thrive within market driven economies where decision making prioritizes individual preferences over collective well being It calls for a reassessment of contemporary policy and regulatory frameworks to align tourism with broader economic and environmental goals By bridging economic geography and tourism studies this book equips scholars policymakers and practitioners with analytical tools to rethink tourism development and advocate for strategies that are economically viable and effectively sustainable inclusive and resilient The Wiley Blackwell Companion to Tourism Alan A.
