Effective Listening Skills for Workplace Excellence Iloki Siziba, 2020-10-16 You do not listen retorts a supervisor to a subordinate after the latter omitted one of the instructions given to them resulting in substandard product The omission of that one instruction may not have been a direct result of failure to listen There could have been other causes but failure to listen effectively has higher chances of causing the omission than any other possible cause That is why the supervisor is concluding that the subordinate is a bad listener You cannot succeed in the workplace if you cannot listen effectively You do not work in isolation but with other people So one way or the other you have to listen to them in as much as they listen to you and effective listening skills become handy If you do not listen to others well they may also not listen to you and the team is fragmented You do not listen shouts a teacher to a student after the student failed the test The ability to pass the test depends on a number of factors but listening plays a very important role in determining whether a learner passes or fails We learn through various ways but most learning is through listening and listening effectively You cannot succeed in school if you are a bad listener You do not listen cries an angry wife when the husband asks a question that had been answered an hour earlier in the conversation We are called upon to give each other an ear every time for relationships to thrive You cannot succeed in marriage with poor listening skills You do not listen is an outcry almost everywhere in business in colleges in homes etc yet everyone regards themselves a good listener You may also think you are a good listener so did I until I gathered the humility and courage to find out and this changed my life You too can learn this important skill No one is born a good listener You have to make a deliberate effort to learn this important skill It improves the quality of your relationships
