access to a cornucopia of information and entertainment but government regulation threatens to bottle up the new technology Cable and telephone companies are both protected from competition and forbidden to enter new markets The Clinton administration considers spending billions of taxpayers dollars to build an information superhighway that private companies are champing at the bit to build at no cost to the government Today s Information Revolution is driven by three smaller revolutions in microelectronic digital and optical technology The microelectronic revolution based on the transistor and then the microprocessor has given us word processors programmable VCRs featureful home telephones and personal computers all of which have moved computing power away from a technical elite and closer to the average citizen The digital revolution allows information in any form even graphics and sound to be processed by machines And the fiber optic revolution means that much more information can be transmitted simultaneously Together those technological changes are erasing the boundaries that have separated voice video text and data communications and are making regulatory policy as obsolete as dial telephones and vacuum tubes Regulations have been based on the outmoded notions of natural monopoly spectrum scarcity and captive audiences none of which seem very compelling in the modern era of Telecompetition Communications analyst Lawrence Gasman argues that the best way to gain the benefits of new information technology is not a government backed communications superhighway but a policy of free markets deregulation propertyrights and upholding the First Amendment The most important role for government is to protect property rights then stand back and watch as new technologies break through the boundaries of old regulations Telecompetition is the comprehensive case for deregulating telecommunications It discusses such key issues as deregulating the Baby Bells spectrum auctions First Amendment rights for broadcasters and the national data highway Telecompetition shows that bureaucrats have neither the knowledge nor the incentive to intelligently guide the Information Revolution With the regulatory stranglehold on telecommunications actually tightening in some ways such as the 1992 Cable Act even as the free market struggles to bring modern technology to all our homes and offices Telecompetition is a valuable argument for deregulation First Amendment rights and free markets     Exploring Mass Media for A Changing World Ray A Hiebert, 2017-10-23 Beautifully written and class tested Exploring Mass Media for a Changing World provides a comprehensive but modestly priced text around which instructors can develop a customized teaching package Written for introductory courses it covers essential information students need in order to understand the media the mass communication process and the role of media in society It summarizes basic generally agreed upon principles theories significant historical events and essential facts but does so in a tightly written readable style Taken together this information can be thought of as a minimum repertoire that all citizens of the information age need in order to become literate consumers and users of mass communication Features include Historical Framework For ease of comprehension media processes and individual media are placed in historical context to show their technological evolution and the effects of those changes on society Organization The first seven chapters deal

The Right to See with Technology Marc Jonathan Blitz, 2025-09-01 This book asks if we have a constitutional right to see or sense our surroundings with technology Do we have a constitutional right to record our surroundings with cameras embedded in smartphones or drones Or to enhance our vision with extended reality technology bionic eyes or brain computer interfaces Courts in the United States have already provided a possible foundation for answering such questions There is they have said a right to document matters of public concern by creating and sharing recordings with others Such recordings extend our perception They let us watch events that are remote in space and time Yet sharing them is also a kind of communication and thus the creation of speech protected by the First Amendment So too might be other ways of seeing with technology This emerging case law raises interesting questions and challenges such as how enhancement of our perceptions can leave room for others privacy This book explores such questions focusing on American constitutional jurisprudence It also argues that in doing so it is helpful to recognize that our interest in using and enhancing our perceptual power isn't only an interest in doing so as part of First Amendment communication It is also linked closely to other rights to personal integrity and the liberty to use our body's perceptual powers and to the constitution's protection for freedom of thought or what some scholars call cognitive liberty Our exercise of perception and our use of it to learn about our surroundings is a crucial part of exercising our and shaping our mind
