Conservation Easements
Prescribed by the Tax Code

Conservation easements are a powerful tool for protecting natural resources and farmland. They are a type of land use restriction that can be used to protect a variety of resources, including wetlands, forests, and farmland. Conservation easements are typically used by landowners who want to protect their land from development while still allowing them to use the land for other purposes. There are three main types of conservation easements: wetland, forest, and farmland. Each type of easement has its own set of rules and regulations, but they all share the same basic purpose: to protect natural resources and farmland for future generations.
