

makers. In the political model, the agenda setting occurs when the public support is gained for an issue. (Cobb & Elder, 1983; Kingdon, 1984; Baumgartner & Jones, 1993 as cited in Dery 2000).

Several ideas generated by policy analysts, researchers, and others have become trends as these have been integrated into thinking and policy making (Barold 2005). Evaluation of a policy brings necessary changes, if required. For e.g. many public housing developments, especially in cities, were originally designed and built to accommodate large numbers of households. The problems to residents in such houses brought attention to the design of public housing developments. It was also realised that the return of policy responsibilities to state and local governments from the central government would offer more suitable policy framing to the local needs. The ill effects of the concentration of poverty developed as observed by public officials and policy scholars. The minorities and poor were shifted to white areas. It is an example where significant amount of public policy attention is aimed at reducing the concentration of poverty (Goetz, 2002 as cited in Barold 2005).

Barold (2005) refers (Lieberman 2002) that while framing or changing a policy equal importance to ideas and institutions should be given. He thinks ideas are 'roadmap' to framing a policy. The pioneer in agenda setting study, Kingdon (1995) states that agenda could be defined as the most aggravated problem of the moment and alternative as policy options capable of solving it. He further elaborates that agenda and policy options arise by the interaction of three elements i.e. Problem, policy and politics. The social groups and politicians to mobilize system in favour of a specific issue use these three elements. The policy issues generally come to the notice of bureaucrats, elected politicians and public through statistical data, wide protests or feedback of previous policies. Of the three interacting elements of policy framing, the policy stream contacts policy experts working for academic institutions, governmental agencies and interest groups related to the concerned policy field who propose legislation and alternatives. The political stream ensures that the proposals receive the direct backing of a major political advocate, usually the ruling government. The role of this third element (politics) is crucial in determining policy.
