

incontestable); that some of the references are to French translations of English work: e.g. Halle (1964) is given as Halle (1967) (144); and most significantly, that the index of terms defined at the end contains many entries in a form that no one is likely to think of looking up: 'identification', 'secondness', 'laying bare', etc. and fails to connect up many others. For instance, there is no entry in the index for deixis, and the entry for 'deictic' refers to an (excellent) article on the 'Typology of the phenomena of meaning' which fails to cross-refer to 'Enunciation' where deixis is again briefly discussed, this time actually using the term 'deixis'. It would also have been useful to have a further index of names referring to all the bibliographical entries which are listed piecemeal after and within individual articles. The index of names that is given is inadequate. However, the references are generally extremely accurate, the only serious inaccuracy I noticed was, ironically, to Smith (1973) (168).

There are, inevitably, a few factual errors in a work of this scope: Malinowski was not English, Shakespeare did not write Oedipus Rex; but overall the merits of ED more than counterbalance its defects.

Linguistics has been riven by dissension for years, but the books under review show surprisingly clearly how much common ground is now shared by virtually all its practitioners. We should be correspondingly grateful both to Crystal and to Ducrot and Todorov.
