Introduction

It is important to note that the nursing process is a critical thinking model which needs to adhere to a specific list of competencies. One of such competencies includes cultural diversity and inclusion since healthcare is a universal need. However, one should acknowledge that there are differences between cultures, which is why nursing professionals must be competent in providing care with this form of consideration. The emphasis for the project on central line-associated bloodstream infections or CLABSI project needs to focus on the safety culture or culture of clinical excellence, which is determined by organizational culture.

Cultural Considerations of the Evidence-Based Practice Project's Stakeholders

A unique cultural characteristic of the EBP target audience is the safety culture among full-time nurses. One should be aware that such a culture of clinical excellence is a part of organizational culture, which can be attributable to the nursing staff. It is stated that "safety culture is the product of individual and group values, attitudes, perceptions, competencies and behavior patterns that determine the commitment, style, and proficiency of managing a healthy and safe organization" (Costa et al., 2018, p. 2). In other words, it is a complex system of beliefs and practices that create an environment of safety for patients.

Moreover, a poor safety culture can manifest itself without a deliberate effort to do so because it can be a byproduct of focus on efficiency or work volume. It should be noted that "a culture that accepts and adopts extra roles as a normal daily routine may not articulate or perceive any impact of such additional work" (Ross et al., 2018, p. 3). Thus, it is clear that many elements of safety culture are not directly or visibly perceivable by those who practice it. For example, a nurse might take on an additional
