

Understanding of The Social Justice

When people hear social justice, they may not really understand what the term means and may assume it is just a form of freedom and our rights. According to the Oxford dictionary, Social Justice is justice regarding the distribution of wealth, opportunities, and privileges within a society. However, I do not believe that definition is completely correct. What it fails to acknowledge is that the distribution should be equal among individuals of a society. If it is not equal for all individuals, then social justice is not happening completely because it is not fair for some to get justice and others not. The #MeToo movement has been active for over decade but has recently begun to receive attention after multiple women accused producer Harvey Weinstein of sexual assault and harassment (North, para 3) and actress Alyssa Milano tweeted a message with the hashtag (Lafuente, para 2). The hashtag was first coined in 2006 by Tirana Burke, creator of the Just Be Inc, an organization initially started for women of color and has expanded to all women who have been assaulted or harassed (Lafuente, para 9,10). Burke used the term after an encounter she had with a little girl named Heaven, and her story was so heartbreaking the only thing Burke could say was "me too" (Lafuente, para 12-14). In the following months, more people around the world have come out with their own stories of assault and harassment and some have led protests to bring more awareness. Some workplaces have now made changes to protect workers and address the issue of sexual harassment after multiple complaints (North, para 7). It is very important especially in today's time that people come out with their experiences because they are still victims out there and hearing from survivors can encourage them to speak out.

The Take a Knee movement was started in 2016 by 49ers quarterback Colin Kaepernick to protest police brutality and racial injustice (Lake and Hodge, para 2). It comes after multiple videos have been released showing police officers shooting and killing unarmed black men (Mindock, para 10). Instead of standing for the national anthem, players of different sports, most football players, and team owners have been kneeling, locking arms, or raising a fist to protest. Initially Kaepernick sat down during the anthem, but later choose to kneel to attempt to show respect for military veterans (Mindock, para 7). When asked about his protest Kaepernick has said "I am not going to stand up to show pride in a flag for country that oppresses black people and people of color" (Lake and Hodge, para 3). There has been backlash against players who kneel because one side feels they are in a way disrespecting the flag and that politics have no place in sports. However, the other side of the argument agree with the movement because they feel it is br
