

antidepressants and a placebo. The placebo itself, is harmless and a false medication, as it tricks the patient to think that it is an actual medication. The results showed that both the placebo and the antidepressants affected the brain because the placebo increased brain activity more than the antidepressants. Thus, Leuchter and Witte found that patients diagnosed with depression that received medical treatments improved just as well as the patients who received a placebo. Even though the results from Leuchter and Witte's study showed positive results of biomedical treatments, there are trial and error problems that make the study unethical. From Leuchter and Witte's study, it showed fast and favorable results from the medical treatments, though the patients may have lied about their condition as they might have been in desperate need for that particular medicine that needs to be prescribed. Also, if a medical treatment is prescribed to the patient, the patient may become addicted to the medicine and become dependent of the drug, which may cause further problems with their disorder.

Another way to approach patients, who suffer from psychological disorders, is the individual approach. The individual approach treatment involves one on one therapy that deals with the mental health. In which the patients discuss their disorder with a psychiatrist or therapist in private. Since the individual approach treatment is carried out in private with one on one sessions, it allows the patients with psychological disorders a secure environment to feel free to express and converse about their issues. Utilizing the individual method as treatment is commonly used as it is effective in disorders such as depression, PTSD or eating disorders. The individual approach has been found to be more efficient than the use of biomedical treatment because it allows
