is the growing use of the term "religion" to describe a wide range of phenomena. The "religion" that, for example, is distinguished from "religiosity" is defined by its spiritual dimension. Although spiritual refers to the religious, neither is the religious itself spiritual (1999). In the other words, the "religious" dimension of social reality is not the domain of a social science or religious studies, because, beyond of spiritual studies, the religious refers to other aspects of culture. The concept of "religion" is therefore not confined to a particular domain of study.
