

WOODLAND TITS AND WARBLERS

These small, lively birds are quite bold and aggressive by nature, often occupying a great deal of the range for food through the woodland. They frequently construct elaborate nests and have relatively large clutches of eggs, and they sometimes nest twice during the season. They are also residents in southern climates through the winter months, generally nesting a second time.

Long-tailed tit

Aegiphys trichas

The tail feathers of these tits can account for nearly half their total length. These birds occurring in southern Europe have a completely white head and underparts. The Turkish race (A. t. trichas) has a black cap and a black breast. The plumage is mostly black, including a bill, with a white streaking on its cheeks. Long-tailed tits are lively birds, usually seen in small parties, and frequently in the company of other tits. They are often seen in the mountains during the winter, when the warblers are without leaves. Long-tailed tits will roost together, which helps to conserve their body heat — sometimes as many as 10 birds may be clustered together. Long-tailed tits can be quite noisy when feeding during the day. Their feeding period starts early, in February, and may extend through until June.
