

AUDACIOUS EYE-SPOTS (LEPIDOPTERA)

While many butterflies and moths depend on camouflage to stay safe, many species have evolved complicated eyespots that are celebrated and admired by human cultures all over the world. Scientists are still investigating what these eyespots do. In some cases, the eyespots may scare a predator into thinking a bigger animal is looking back at them.

IO MOTH

Automeris io

When resting under the side of a tree, the io moth looks to resemble bark in that grayish-brown, streaked pattern. However, the io moth opens up its wings quickly to reveal a pair of shockingly large eyespots that shock the predator and scare it away.

Like its close relative, the white of the moth appears black from their pupal without camouflage and do not feed as adults. All of the energy the io moth feeds up in its adult life, it utilizes during the caterpillar life stage.

EUROPEAN PEACOCK

Aglais io

Unlike many butterflies, the European peacock hibernates during the winter months. During this time, it hides its wings together and stays mostly still to avoid a striking form. Should a larger bird approach during the winter, the butterfly opens its wings to reveal four dramatic eyespots.

Scientists have noted how great these eyespots are for scaring predators away and concluded that the distance is closer than against small birds. The European peacock has another defense for longer eyes and white eye patterns as mimicking how like a snake.

COMET MOTH

Argemone sylvia

The comet moth's unusual wing patterns are usually used to warn off birds and insects that detect it during the day while it rests. At night, when the comet moth flies, it leaves a different pattern — bats.

Researchers do not think eyespots help because these predators focus on light when there is low light. To stop this predator from attacking, the comet moth has evolved a different adaptation. The long trailing pheromone on the tips of the comet moth's wings acts as they fly, confusing the bat's echolocation the moth's tail rather than the head.

FOREST GIANT OWL

Caligo eurilochus

The forest giant owl takes wing during the day and hides in the day upon large fluttering wings only at dusk and dawn. Its wings are thought to mimic the other predators within of this time, especially owls.

Because of its beautiful wings, the forest giant owl is one of the world's most collected butterflies. Its ground is found in this unusual species, it never used as much of it in the natural range.
